KIDS FOOD FESTIVAL BACK AT WHITEMAN PARK

Building on the success of last year, the Yum in My Tum Food Festival is back on November 29 and better than ever.

The Yum in My Tum food festival is a one-of-a-kind Australian event, giving kids heaps of opportunities to explore all the wonders and possibilities of food.

There will be plenty of hands-on activities throughout the day where kids can get involved in decorating cupcakes, making lemonade, mini pizzas and much more.

Whiteman Park manager, Steve Lowe, said the event guaranteed fun for the whole family as well as educating kids about food and nutrition.

“We’re looking forward to hosting the event for the second year running, and it will be a great opportunity for local producers to come together and provide an interactive cooking experience,” Mr Lowe said.

“The Yum in My Tum food festival is a brilliant and much-needed initiative from JVG Events and Whiteman Park are really proud to support such a unique event.

“Being so near to the Swan Valley, the event just really fits with Whiteman Park.”

JVG events director Johanna Garnett is excited about the future of Yum in My Tum and has recently been approached to take the concept to Sydney to implement a similar festival.

“Parents and local businesses raved about Yum in My Tum last year and we’ve got a lot of support for this year’s festival which has allowed us to expand the activities list making it bigger and better than before,” Mrs Garnett said.

“It’s a great chance for little eaters to taste and try new things and develop a wider food palate as well as an appreciation of cultural dishes and good local produce.

“It is also about giving children an understanding of the food process, understanding where our food actually comes from.”

Entry for the whole family is free and there will be a range of stalls, food samples and activities throughout the day.
